PEARL LAKE DIVE AND PICNIC AND SATURDAY JULY 4TH

Who needs Fort Lauderdale Florida??

Let's celebrate the dive season with some easy local diving at beautiful Pearl Lake. Its beach is just as good as Florida's anyway.

We can eat, dive, eat, dive, and do it all again until they throw us out. Bring guests, non-divers, and any other crazy companions or relatives. Let's have a good relaxing dive day and celebrate the 4th.

I will set up by 9 AM or so, my goal is the east shore of the lake (if not there, just look around). With a little help from my friends I will have all sandwich materials and non-alky beverages that we will need. . . and dessert, of course. Please come prepared to pay the club $5 or $10 per person, and bring your own adult beverages. Admission to Pearl is still $20.

I could use a little help with vittles and other necessities if anyone has time. Sign up at the June meeting, or before, or after.

JELLYFISH THREATEN TO DOMINATE THE OCEANS

Posted By Sara-Lise Haith on Monday Jun 8, 2009 @ 09:44 in Scuba Diving

Giant jellyfish are taking over parts of the world's oceans due to overfishing and other human activities, researchers say.

Nomura jellyfish are the biggest in the world and can grow as big as a sumo wrestler. They weigh up to 200 kilograms (440 lbs.) and can reach 2 metres (6.5 feet) in diameter!

Dr Anthony Richardson of CSIRO Marine & Atmospheric Research and colleagues, report their findings in the journal Trends in Ecology and Evolution.

Richardson says jellyfish numbers are increasing, particularly in Southeast Asia, the Black Sea, the Gulf of Mexico and the North Sea.

Richardson and his colleagues have reviewed literature linking jellyfish blooms with overfishing and eutrophication - high levels of nutrients.

The team recommends a number of actions in its paper, published in the journal Trends in Ecology and Evolution and released to coincide with World Oceans Day.

They say it is important to reduce overfishing, especially of small pelagic fish like sardines, and to reduce run-off. They also say it is important to control the transport of jellyfish around the world in ballast water and aquariums.

Jellyfish are considered simple jelly-like sea animals, which are related to the microscopic animals that form coral. They generally start their life as a plant-like polyp on the sea bed before budding off into the well-known bell-shaped medusa. Jellyfish have tentacles containing pneumatocyst cells, which act like little harpoons that lodge in prey to sting and kill them.

ARCHEOLOGICAL EVIDENCE OF HUMAN ACTIVITY FOUND BENEATH LAKE HURON

More than 100 feet deep in Lake Huron, on a wide stoney ridge that 9,000 years ago was a land bridge, University of Michigan researchers have found the first archeological evidence of human activity preserved beneath the Great Lakes. The researchers located what they believe to be caribou-hunting structures and camps used by the early hunters of the period. TRAVEL WARNING: TRINIDAD & TOBAGO NOW MURDER CAPITAL OF THE CARIBBEAN

SPEYSIDE, Tobago — With a steady rise in violent crime including an alarming increase in homicides, Trinidad & Tobago has overtaken Jamaica as the "murder capital of the Caribbean". While homicides increased 2% in Jamaica in 2008, murders were up a staggering 38% in Trinidad & Tobago. Although much of the violence is gang-related, tourists have increasingly become targets for robbery, sexual assault and murder. Both the U.S. & the U.K. have issued warnings to travelers about increasing violence & the failure of police in Tobago to apprehend & prosecute criminals.

TIMELY FISH TALE: HAWAII FISH COUGHS UP GOLD WATCH

ELEELE, Hawaii – Hawaii resident Curt Carish boasts a timely fish tale: a 10-inch reef fish he caught by hand in shallow water coughed up a ticking gold watch.

Carish says he was enjoying a picnic Wednesday on Port Allen beach when he saw the nenuë fish awkwardly swimming close to shore. He says a friend gave him a bamboo stick and told him to get the fish. So he jumped into the waist-high water and hit the nenuë until it went limp. He noticed the fish had an abnormally large belly as he tossed it into a cooler.

A friend opened the cooler later to discover a gold watch next to the fish's mouth. Carish says the watch was ticking and keeping correct time.

A diver examines the deck gun of a Soviet submarine that was sunk during Finland's winter war in 1940.

SOVIET SUB FOUND

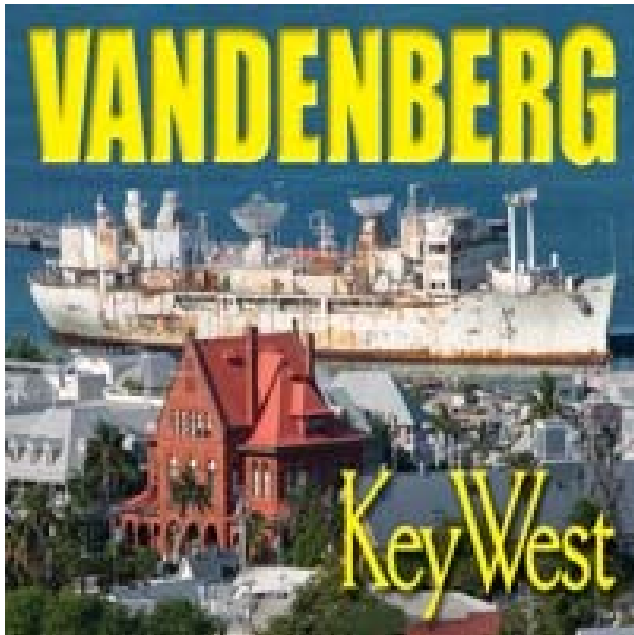

ALAND ISLANDS, Finland — Divers have found the wreck of the S-2 Soviet submarine after a decade-long search in the Baltic Sea between Sweden and Finland. The team of divers that found the World War 2 wreck informed Russian and Finnish authorities about their discovery but declined to reveal its location to protect it from scuba looters.

According to Markus Lindholm, curator of maritime archaeology at Finland's National Board of Antiquities who helped identify the wreck, the sub was last seen at the ocean's surface by a lighthouse keeper on Market Island, west of the Aland archipelago. The lightkeeper's log, which stated that an explosion was heard after the sub headed north and dived into a Finnish minefield, helped divers locate the wreck after nearly 70 years.

"According to all available sources no other submarine has sunk in those waters," said Lindholm, curator of maritime archaeology at Finland's National Board of Antiquities. Photos taken by the divers confirm that the sub hit a mine. "The mine must have hit the submarine hull near the torpedo tubes and then the whole thing blew up," he said. The submarine sunk with all 50 hands on board on January 2, 1940 after hitting a mine.

Many thanks to Nancy Boucha for sending this one on. Excerpted from <http://www.foxnews.com/story/0,2933,522209,00.html> After a decade of planning and an $8.6 million, the General Hoyt S. Vandenberg was finally sunk on May 27 and is now a public dive site. Forty-four explosive charges sent the 524-foot-long boat 140 feet to the bottom seven miles south of Key West.

USS VANDENBERG SUNK USING EXPLOSIVES TO FORM ARTIFICIAL REEF OFF

A ship last used by the U.S. Air Force to track missiles and spacecraft became the world's second-largest intentionally sunk artificial reef Wednesday.

Using explosives attached to the hull, crews sank the decommissioned Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg about seven miles off Key West, Fla.

The scheduled 10 a.m. blast to force the hulking vessel to the ocean floor was delayed by about 20 minutes because of sea life in the vicinity — specifically, sea turtles.

Officials hope the newly sunken ship will attract fish and divers and relieve recreational pressure on nearby natural reefs.

Explosives attached to the vessel's hull were detonated to flood the 17,000-ton, 523-foot-long vessel that was first built as a cargo ship in World War II. It was expected to settle on the sandy bottom in 140 feet of clear water only minutes after it was sunk.

The project has been years in the making. The cost is about $8.6 million, from acquiring the ship to cleaning it. Officials in the Florida Keys expect it to pay dividends, up to $8 million in annual tourism-related revenue, mostly from divers flocking to get a look at the underwater spectacle and related businesses. The idea is to not only to attract tourists, but to help protect the Keys' natural reefs, already suffering from excessive diving, snorkeling and fishing along with warming ocean temperatures.

Joe Weatherby, project organizer at an artificial reef company called Reefmakers, said people — and fish — will now be drawn to the wreck from nearby natural coral, "giving the reef a breather, which is what it needs."

Preparation for sinking has taken months of inspections and cleanup to remove contaminants. Workers hauled off more than a million feet of wire, 1,500 vent gaskets, dozens of watertight steel doors, 81 bags of asbestos, 193 tons of potentially cancer-causing substances, 46 tons of garbage that could come loose and float to the surface, 300 pounds of materials containing mercury and 185 55-gallon drums of paint chips.

The cleanup was performed at two

May 26: The USS Vandenberg is towed out of Key West harbor in preparation for its sinking Wednesday to form an artificial reef.

Norfolk, Va., shipyards before the boat made the 1,100-mile voyage, arriving in Key West on April 22. Permitting was required from 18 local, state and federal agencies.

The Vandenberg began as the Gen. Harry Taylor and was later commissioned by the Army as a transport vessel, ferrying troops and supplies from San Francisco to island bases in the western Pacific Ocean in 1944. In 1945, it carried troops home from Europe near the end of World War II. It was later used by the Navy as a transport ship, and was transferred to the Air Force in 1961, when it was renamed the Vandenberg.

For about 20 more years, the ship served as a missile tracker throughout the height of the Cold War and was retired in 1983.

Organizers say it will serve as "the anchor" to the region's wide array of existing sunken vessels and wrecks from Key Largo to Key West, where some estimate there's a shipwreck about every 300 yards.

The Vandenberg sinking apparently went more smoothly than that of the Spiegel Grove off Key Largo in 2002.

That 510-foot decommissioned landing ship dock partially sank upside-down, hours before an attempt to scuttle it to create an artificial reef. The sudden sinking sent 40 workers onboard scrambling for safety and left the ship's bow sticking out of the water for three weeks.

The first-largest intentionally sunk artificial reef is the USS Oriskany, which was sent to the bottom of the ocean three years ago off the coast of Pensacola Beach in the Florida Panhandle.
